

In 2009, a collective art-radio project, initiated by Laurent Schmid, Ratio.fm, transformed into Laptopradio. The principles remained the same: it was to be a collectively developing art radio project in which the participants could decide on and be responsible for content and form. It was also a radio that broadcast sporadically and aimed to make as much of the content as possible - including the musical parts - itself and not to rely on canned music. During this time, Laurent Schmid brought Laptopradio into the Work.Master programme of HEAD-Geneva and so it ran as a hybrid project in which students and independent artists were equally involved. Since 2020, it has again been separated from the Master's programme and has since been called laptopradio.
